NOTES ON THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

BY JAMES EDMUNDS, ESQ., M.D., L.R.C.P., M.R.C.S., &c.

Late Senior Physician to the British Lying-in Hospital.

That alcohol may be useful as a medicine is a proposition which cannot be questioned while we admit that arsenic, mercury, and other substances, totally foreign to the constitution of the body, are useful as medicines. Many poisonous substances, when administered by a wise and discriminating physician, are of real value in the treatment of disease, just as the knife and the caustic, though undoubtedly agents which wound and mutilate the body, are yet sometimes the means of saving life. In that sense I rank alcohol. The theory that alcohol is a stimulant appears to me to have no foundation in physiological fact. My own conviction is that alcohol is never a stimulant, but always a narcotic, and that when alcohol is prescribed as a stimulant, the prescriber labours under a delusion and the patient falls into a snare.

Alcohol is a poison—and a poison of that kind which stupifies and paralyzes, i.e., a narcotic poison. In large doses it kills as certainly and swiftly as a dose of prussic acid, and many more inquests are held upon persons killed right off by alcohol than upon persons killed by prussic acid or any other poison. Indeed, cases of paralysis by cold, cases of apoplexy, &c., are frequently mistaken for cases of intoxication. The phenomena in these cases are precisely the same in character. And is it not rational, on a priori grounds, to assume that alcohol, which is a narcotic in large doses, should be a narcotic also in small doses? When alcohol seems to act as a stimulant, it proves a snare to its victim, blunting his sensibilities, taking the edge off his mind, and sapping his energy. Thus man feels less of cold and heat, of pain and anguish, of hunger and thirst, of labour and trouble. But he does so only by virtue of a descent in the order of nature and by a temporary assimilation with lower forms of life, and while he feels less, he suffers not only the penalty which nature has prescribed for those who transgress her laws, but also the added injury produced by the alcoholic poison. I might enlarge upon this theme and show how, alike in India and at the Poles, men who work under the influence of alcohol break down in mind and become diseased in body. But I can only add that alcohol has no true stimulating powers; that its use as a medicine is simply that of a narcotic; and that it must be classed with ether, chloroform, and opium, and should be used with like care and discrimination.

I shall be told that the weight of medical opinion is against this. That may be so. I reply that in the last generation the weight of medical opinion was in favour of bleeding, starving, and mercurialising the very cases in which the weight of medical opinion now prescribes alcohol and condemns the practice of the last generation. Medical dogma has never been anything but a delusion and a snare, and, despite the care and conscientiousness of medical men, the brandy practice of this generation will be looked back upon as a greater curse to society than all the bleeding, starving, and poisoning of the last generation.

Study the admirable text-book by Dr. Lees, just issued from the press and, having made yourself acquainted with the facts and bearings of the question, ask for a reason for the use of alcohol, whenever your doctor prescribes it,—get him to explain to you the object which the alcohol is to effect in the case. You will find that your doctor generally has no reason to give you. If he falls back on dogma and on his opinion, ask him what the dogma and the opinion of the doctors did for the patients of the last generation. He will reply that it killed nine sick persons for one that it cured, and you will then ask him how you are to know that the drink dogma of today is less dangerous.
